Everybody's Talking!

Big hand: Talk about a big hand—not a human hand or a hand of cards, but the hand of a clock! The one in question kept track of minutes and, until recently, was located on the clock tower of St. Katharinen Church in Hamburg, Germany. The 20-kilogram (44-lb.) hand, measuring two meters (6.5 feet) long, somehow became dislodged from its home and tumbled down 40 meters (131 ft.) to the street below. Because it fell off in the middle of the night, not many people were around so, luckily, nobody got hit by the hand. This minute hand's partner, the hour hand, is still safely in its position overlooking the city.

Crowing cherry tree: Instead of cutting down an old cherry tree, Jim Hughes of East Wemyss in Fife (Scotland), had a more creative idea. He got out his tree pruners and shaped the tree into the shape of a rooster. The leafy replica stands 14 feet tall and sits in Jim's front garden. To make his creation look even more authentic, he added an orange beak and a red comb. The pensioner is quite proud of his rooster, whom he named "Jock." Passersby stop with cameras to get a few shots. In the end, it's much better to have a cherry tree in the shape of a rooster than no cherry tree at all.

Believe your eyes: A casual walk on the beach turned into a somewhat scary event for a pedestrian in Pompano Beach, Florida (US). As the man strolled along the shore, he noticed something unnerving—a giant, softball-sized eyeball in the sand. He called the authorities, who sent it to a research center. Scientists soon pinpointed the identity of the eyeball's owner—a giant swordfish. The likely explanation for the eyeball's appearance on the beach is that the swordfish was caught by a fisherman, who tossed the eye back into the ocean.

Loud ringing: The sound of church bells usually brings peaceful feelings to listeners. Not so in Mostoles, a small town near Madrid (Spain). There, local residents feel agitated and upset when the bells of Our Lady of the Assumption Church begin to toll. The bells are very loud. The cacophonous ringing hits the human ear at 30 decibels more than the permitted sound level of 55 decibels. Town folk want to fine the church for breaking noise rules, but the parish priest is concerned because the congregation can't afford it. Now the question is, will the bells toll on?

Did You Know...

Monster bug: Did you know that insects were bigger in ancient times? A group of scientists tested this idea by raising their own prehistoric dragonfly. By simulating Earth's air conditions from 300 million years ago, they produced a dragonfly that was 15 percent larger than those found today.

Potato goodness: Thinking of peeling off the skin before chowing down on a potato? Think again. The skin contains more nutrients per ounce than the potato flesh. Not only that, but potato skins are crispy and delicious when cooked.

Grounded: American singer Madonna has always loved music, even when she was a teenager. At the age of 15, she snuck out to see a concert by singer David Bowie. The future famous songstress was grounded for the summer.

Give and take: Despite their blood-sucking reputation, vampire bats can be truly generous. After feeding on their prey, often these bats will share the bounty with their offspring and companions.

Grassroots: When thinking of grass, many people picture the simple green plant found on their front lawns. Actually, the grass family includes about 10,000 versatile species, including corn, wheat, and rice.

On the Lighter Side

What do you get when you cross a gym with a construction company? Body builders.

Why is it that if someone tells you there are a billion stars in the universe, you'll believe her. But if she tells you a wall has wet paint, you'll have to touch it to be sure?

Time flies when you're having fun. Unless, of course, you're a frog, in which case a fun time is when you're having flies.

What do you call an elephant at the North Pole? Lost.

Patient: "Which two letters of the alphabet spell trouble for your teeth?"

Dentist: "D-K."
