Everybody's Talking!

Take-off: How much would your life change if cars were flown in the sky, instead of driven on the ground? Engineers are taking first steps to make this a reality, but using something a little simpler: a bicycle. The F-bike is a flying machine developed in about 18 months by a team of engineers from the Czech Republic. The contraption uses helicopter flight technology to lift the bicycle off the ground with six battery-powered propellers. The device flew a life-size human dummy around a large room for a five-minute test flight. Before testing with a real human, the engineers must develop more powerful propellers to support the extra weight. Hold on tight!

Pasta hairdos: Manufacturers know that unique and interesting packaging is a "must" in order to sell their wares. That's where package designers come into play. One such designer is Russian Nikita Konkin, who created clever boxes containing different kinds of pasta. On the boxes, she cut windows of different shapes to resemble haircuts, such as a long, straight cut, a curled, short style, and an upswept hairdo. The pasta shows through the windows in the boxes and matches the hairstyle. For example, the box with the curly style contains cavatappi. (Cavatappi is a pasta similar to macaroni.)

Speed demon: "Once a daredevil, always a daredevil" would perfectly describe French former stunt double, Eric Barone. After retiring from stunt work, Barone became a record-breaking downhill mountain biker. He holds the record for the fastest bike ride on snow for racing down a French ski slope at 223 kilometers per hour (139 mph) using a specialized bike. If riding a bike down an icy mountain doesn't seem dangerous enough, Barone set a land speed record of 172 kph (107 mph) down the Cerro Negro volcano in Nicaragua, but his bike disintegrated in the process. These breathtaking feats earned him the nickname "Red Baron."

Flying shark: Golfers yell "Fore!" when a shot goes astray, but how could they possibly prepare for a shark falling from the sky? At a golf course in San Juan Capistrano, California (US), an employee found the two-foot long shark in the grass. Puncture wounds suggested that a bird of prey had dropped the shark. Wanting to return it to its home, the employee found a bucket of water and took the shark back to the ocean, five miles away. Watch out golfers—the next one could be a hole-in-one!

Did You Know...

Food as fuel: Dragonflies use 100 times more energy when they are flying compared to when they are resting. To get that energy, they eat 15 percent or more of their body weight each day.

Ancient snack: Popcorn was around long before the arrival of movie theaters. While excavating a cave in New Mexico (US), archaeologists found ears of popcorn that dated back 4,000 years.

Skin color: Different substances affect the color of people's skin, the most important being a pigment called melanin. This pigment also protects the skin from the ultraviolet rays of the sun.

Trading post: Canada's capital city of Ottawa has long been a center for trade. Its name stems from the Algonquin word "adawe," which translates to English as "to trade."

King of trees: Redwood National Park in California (US) is home to Hyperion, the world's tallest tree. It stands 379 feet high. The location of this spectacle of nature is kept secret to avoid damage from tourists.
