Everybody's Talking!

Glass cakes: American glass artist Shayna Leib would love to eat desserts, but she can't digest many of the ingredients in sweet treats. Instead, she uses her glass-blowing talent to make desserts into works of art. The items she produces would be mouth-watering if they were real. How about a cake decorated with chocolate shavings and maraschino cherries? Or chocolate cheesecake topped with whipped cream? Viewers can salivate over coffee torte or a hazelnut and caramel delicacy. Mmmmm! However, don't dig in with a fork: the porcelain and glass from which these works of art are crafted might just break.

Wet suit: Part of the fun of getting married is dressing up in wedding finery. For a groom in Kitchener, Ontario (Canada), however, his wedding suit wasn't as important as the safety of a little boy. Clayton Cook and his bride, Brittany Ross Cook, were getting their pictures taken in a park when, seemingly out of the blue, Cook turned around and jumped into the river. Turns out he had noticed a little boy struggling in the water, and his instinct to help kicked in. After saving the boy, Cook changed out of his wet wedding suit into dry clothes.

Desert flowers: There is an extremely dry region in Chile called the Atacama Desert. It rarely gets any precipitation, and it is made up of stony terrain and salt lakes. Looking out over this desert on a normal day, visitors see sand and rocks in muted gray and tan. All that changes when a rare rainstorm occurs. When that happens, 200 types of desert flowers start blooming in spectacular fields of purple, yellow, and blue. Called desierto florido ("flowering desert"), this phenomenon only happens in the Atacama every five to seven years.

Collie fundraisers: Organizers of fundraisers think up lots of interesting ideas to raise money, but here's one that dog lovers would appreciate: gather as many Border Collies as possible in one place. That's what happened in Willaston, Australia, when a group called the Border Collie Owners of South Australia invited these dogs and their owners to a local park for a get-together. What an amazing sight when 576 Border Collies showed up to enjoy the day together with their masters. The event raised over $6,000 (AUD) for charity.
