Everybody's Talking!

Ball houses: A community of homes in the Netherlands looks like it belongs on another planet. Located in the city of Den Bosch, each of the 50 homes is round and sits on a cylinder. There are several round windows in each home. Designed by the late Dries Kreijkamp, an artist and sculptor, the all-white homes were part of an experimental housing project. Built in 1984 and still occupied today, each spherical dwelling has three floors; the bedrooms are on the first floor, the bathroom is on the middle floor, and the living area and kitchen are on the third floor. The community is called Bolwoningen.

Flying high: When flying a kite in areas that also have air traffic, it's best to keep the kite reeled in to low altitudes. A man flying his kite near the inner harbor in Victoria, British Columbia (Canada), didn't use good judgment in this situation. Neil Parman's kite soared to a height of 300 meters (984 feet). Air traffic controllers had to divert some incoming float planes. Police investigating the incident demanded that Parman immediately bring in his kite. The kite enthusiast, who thought he was just having fun with his hobby, was unaware of the risk that his kite could have posed to planes coming and going from the harbor.

Urban clothing art: People who want to wear T-shirts or carry handbags with a truly urban design need look no further than a German art collective called Raubdruckerin ("pirate printers"). Founded by Emma-France Raff and her father Johannes Kohlrusch, this team finds interesting designs in the urban environment on items such as manhole covers or grates. With an audience of passersby, team members brush ink on the surface of the item and transfer it to a hoodie, a T-shirt or other apparel. The result allows people to see, and wear, details of the city that usually go unnoticed.

Vending machine surprise: People usually use vending machines for commodities like potato chips, drinks, and sandwiches. At a French seaside resort called Île de Ré, tourists and locals can obtain an unexpected treat from these food dispensers: freshly caught oysters. For people who love this type of seafood, the refrigerated vending machines around town let them satisfy their oyster cravings at any time, night or day. One oyster farmer, Tony Berthelot, set up a machine adjacent to his farm, so buyers can be sure that their purchases are very fresh.

Quoteable Quotes

"Habit rules the unreflecting herd." —William Wordsworth
"When tillage begins, other arts follow. The farmers, therefore, are the founders of human civilization."
—Daniel Webster

Did You Know...

Black ice: The term "black ice" refers to a thin layer of slippery ice that occurs on roads when precipitation freezes as it hits the pavement. The ice blends in with the road, making it hard to see, thus causing very dangerous driving conditions.

Climbing skill: Known for their ability to adapt to many habitats, including cities, raccoons are good swimmers. However, they don't usually swim unless forced to do so. They'd rather use their climbing skills to scale trees and fences.

Gifted actor: With a gift for mimicking accents, English actor Gary Oldman has used different accents in nearly all of his movies. He won a 2018 Academy Award for Best Actor for his portrayal of Winston Churchill in Darkest Hour.

Guitar tuning: Today's guitars usually have six strings, with standard tuning being E, A, D, G, B, and E. However, the first guitars of several centuries ago only had four strings that were tuned to C, F, A, and D.

Snail snack: The French dish, escargots à la bourguignonne, consists of snails served in their shells. But first they are cooked in a savory sauce containing white wine and butter, along with a dash of garlic and parsley.

On the Lighter Side

Playground: the stuff kids use to make mudpies.

Don't make a fuss over me. Just treat me as you would anyone else who's as great as I am.

How can you jump off a 50-foot ladder and not get hurt? Jump off the first rung.

Bank robber: "Give me all your money."
Bank teller: "Take the books, too. I'm short $10,000."

When some people retire, nobody knows the difference.
